

Price Discrimination and IP Exhaustion

David Olson

This paper exams the use of patent licensing to promote price discrimination. The paper shows the ongoing incentives to use patent licenses to achieve product differentiation and price discrimination. The paper then explores the historical and current legal regime regarding patent exhaustion. The paper concludes by discussing how patent owners may attempt price discrimination under the current patent exhaustion case law, as well as the costs and benefits of such attempts.